Kristine Huskey—Guantanamo Doctors

A lot of my clients said... yeah, they were, they were... they'd see the doctor about, you know, their headaches or whatever that they had. And they were getting, you know, drugs. That they weren't told what the drugs were, but they felt that it made them tired all the time, or kept them awake all the time. And basically, my sense was, is that they were not—even though I know this, you know, any press release from the government that you'll read going back all the way to 2002... "They got the best medical care, they got better medical care than they ever would have got in their own country." Blah blah blah. From my clients, you know, what they told me was sort of a different story. You know, that maybe, you know, they, if they had a broken bone or something they got, you know, they got it set very well, but I think that, you know, that as a whole, the doctors were there, from what I understand, to yes, to make sure that the detainees were kept in good health. But they were also there for the mission, which was to break them, to interrogate them, and to learn about them as much as possible. Even if they were the doctors who were setting the bones or doing, giving... you know, dispensing, you know, Ibuprofen. Is that, that was... that was the mission. And I know from what my clients said that they were not, you know, they never felt like there was a patient-physician confidentiality. I mean, it was.... they just said, "Are you kidding? That wasn't my doctor, I couldn't confide in him. He was," you know, "he was against me, he thought I was a terrorist." You know, so, it's very... I think it's very disturbing.
