Sondra Crosby—Saudi Arabian Terrorist Rehabilitation Program

They are damaged with post-traumatic stress disorder, with depression. They've had social isolation. They don't know how to integrate with people. They've lost their ability to work, just to even function. So, in my experience, I would say that people released from Guantanamo need a rehabilitation program, a comprehensive rehabilitation program.

And that would include not only mental health treatment and counseling, it would include family counseling so family members can learn to work together. It would include job training and reintegration into society and whatever else is necessary to a specific situation.

And I did see something like that in Saudi Arabia, of all places. Their terrorist rehabilitation program, they have had 123 people from Guantanamo go through it already. And it's a holistic approach where they take these men and put them in this resort-like area—I mean it is confined but it's a beautiful resort-like area. And they provide religious counseling, religious education, mental health, medical care, job training, they're allowed to take university courses, and they do family counseling. They have families come in and then help the men. So, that kind of holistic approach, I think, is what is necessary to help these men recover.
